According to sources, Apple is gearing up for their next big event on October 27. This event will be focused around the Mac platform and it will be interesting to see what micro-chip Apple uses this time around, and if they can beat the competition in the thin-and-light category that they actually created. It should be interesting to see what they've got up their sleeve, but I'm honestly not expecting much.

The timing of the event is fairly interesting, as it would be scheduled just a day after Microsoft's event on October 26, where the company is expected to unveil a Surface all-in-one, as well as show off the next feature update to Windows 10, which is currently called Redstone 2.
