

The Macbook Pro is a Lie

There was a time when the Macbook Pro was a very premium product geared for professionals (hence the Pro, duh!) but that time has come and gone. The latest Macbook Pro is pretty much anything but "Pro"; according to the guys at the Verge and I'd have to agree with them. If Windows PCs start to charge premium prices for lower-end hardware and missing features, I'd have a fit as well. Take a look for all the details.

The Mac community finds the specs underwhelming, even on the 15-inch model, which uses power-sipping AMD Radeon graphics instead of the world-conquering Nvidia Pascal chips. Emotions are running so low that people are even speculating about whether Apple should do with the Mac what IBM did when it sold off the ThinkPad line to Lenovo.
