With Apple launching a new "flagship" device with the iPhone X, there are always comparisons to the other devices out there. Apple hasn't really been paving the way for years now, but they have been making solid products. It's interesting to see that the iPhone X comes close to the Galaxy S8 in terms of specifications. Even though the S8 has been out for half a year, the iPhone X falls a bit short.

But if Apple has shown one thing time and again with every iPhone generation, it's that optimization of hardware and software matter just as much - if not more - than the hard numbers of which phone has more RAM, which is why Apple's phones tend to perform so well, even with comparatively weaker hardware.
