Sony has made the announcement that they'll be bring their PS Now subscription service to the PC which will allow you to stream a library of over 400 PlayStation games on your PC. In addition to that they've also announced their DualShock 4 USB wireless adapter that will allow you to plug your PlayStation controller into your PC so you can play all of these games. PlayStation fans and people who want to play some of the titles without having to buy the console will probably be happy about this announcement, Hypebeast has the story.

Soon you'll be able to play even more of your favorite PlayStation games on your PC.

Today, Sony took to its PlayStation blog for another major announcement ahead of its September 7 event in New York City: PlayStation Now is coming to Windows PCs. Introduced just last year, the PS Now subscription service offers the ability to stream a library of over 400 games for a monthly fee, meaning you'll soon be able to play franchises like Uncharted, God of War and Ratchet & Clank on your laptop or desktop.
